the 1990s, the number of people in the UK who are employed in the public sector has increased by 1.5 million, from 2.5 million in 1980 to 4 million in 1995 (Department of Health 1996).

There is a growing emphasis on the importance of the public sector in the provision of health care, and the need to ensure that it is able to meet the needs of the population. This has led to a number of initiatives, including the establishment of the National Health Service (NHS) in 1948, and the creation of the Department of Health in 1991. The NHS is a public sector body that provides health care to all people in the UK, and the Department of Health is responsible for the overall management of the NHS.

The public sector is also responsible for the provision of social care services, which are designed to help people with disabilities or other needs to live independently. Social care services are provided by local authorities, and are funded by the government. The public sector is also responsible for the provision of housing, and for the management of the environment.

The public sector is a vital part of the UK's infrastructure, and it is essential that it is able to meet the needs of the population. This requires a commitment to excellence, and to the highest standards of service. The public sector must also be able to adapt to change, and to meet the challenges of the future.

The public sector is a complex and diverse organization, and it is essential that it is able to work effectively with other organizations. This requires a commitment to partnership, and to the highest standards of communication. The public sector must also be able to work with the private sector, and with the voluntary sector, to ensure that the needs of the population are met.
